After graduating from the University of Connecticut, Maggie Sackrider worked as a Zookeeper at Connecticut’s Beardsley Zoo where she provided care for many Critically Endangered Species including Amur tigers and Andean bears. Maggie has published and presented papers on North American River Otter reproduction to national audiences including The American Association of Zookeepers. As a Zoo Educator, she has taught around the state at universities, senior living facilities, nursery schools and everything in between. She is also responsible for the nationally recognized Conservation Discovery Corps a youth volunteer program which teams up with local conservation field researchers.
